*Writer, directors, and/or producers for each project. In addition to the production grant, these S.C. production professionals receive important professional development through support and resources, with the projects often serving as incubators for these professionals.

Trident Tech students work on these projects as Production Assistants or similar in each department, getting hands-on training in a professional production environment and creating mentor relationships with production professionals, a key component of the production industry and a bridge to employment.

^These projects are also professional development and training for crew working on the project. We often bring in high-caliber production professionals who donate their time (at no or heavily-reduced costs), with the crew learning and working under them. Also, because of the low-budget and training nature of these projects, crew are often able to step up into a higher position, giving them training and credits in these higher positions.

^Part of the Nickelodeon’s Filmmaker-in-Residence, where the filmmaker and theater had an ongoing series of training programs for the Columbia community, supported by the project and Indie Grants.

The Tourism Impact of Motion Picture Productions

(SMARI) conducted two research studies designed to assess the impact of a sample of productions set in and/or filmed in South Carolina on leisure travel to the state. The productions included were Dear John, The Patriot, The Notebook, and Army Wives.

These research studies illustrated the level of influenced travel that could be attributed to productions set in South Carolina and gauged potential synergies created between these productions and traditional marketing efforts.

The most recent and most conservative estimate suggests that the selected South Carolina productions may have influenced 1.6 million household visits to South Carolina and approximately $1.7 billion in travel revenue from 2001 - 2010.
