

LIEUTENANT GOVERNORS OF SOUTH CAROLINA 1730–2024

(Originally compiled by
A. S. Salley, Jr., State Historian.)

There were no lieutenant governors under the government of the Lords Proprietors (1670–1719).

A governor who received a commission from the Proprietors was empowered to appoint a deputy to serve in his place in case of his absence from the province. Only twice in the fifty years of the Proprietors' rule was there an exercise of that power. In Oct. 1696, when Governor Archdale was leaving for England, he appointed Landgrave Joseph Blake to serve as deputy governor. Blake served as such until early 1697, when he purchased the share of Thomas Archdale and assumed the governorship in right of a proprietor. In Apr. 1716, when Governor Craven was leaving for England, he appointed Robert Daniell deputy governor. Daniell so served from Apr. 22, 1716 to Apr. 30, 1717, when Governor Robert Johnson arrived and assumed the government. After the Crown had bought the interest of the Lords Proprietors in Carolina in 1729, the British government appointed a governor and a lieutenant governor for South Carolina, with terms of office beginning Jan. 1, 1730. Only three men filled the office of lieutenant governor from Jan. 1, 1730 to Mar. 26, 1776, when South Carolina established an independent government. These were Thomas Broughton, William Bull, and William Bull, Jr., father and son.

Prior to the constitution of 1865, the governor and lieutenant governor were elected by the legislature. The lieutenant governor did not preside over the Senate. The Senate elected its own president from its body.
